The program also complements the campaign from the African First Ladies who are committed to expanding breast cancer awareness.

The public-private partnership's planned activities include breast cancer awareness programs, improved access to breast cancer care, and training of health care providers.

"Strong, healthy women are the foundation of families, of our country, and today in Kenya their health is a priority," said First Lady Margaret Kenyatta.

Breast cancer remains the leading cause of cancer in women in Kenya with more 50 percent of the cases occurring in women aged 40 and above.

The Kenya agreement is part of Roche's Africa Strategy which began in 2015 in seven countries: Nigeria, Kenya, South Africa, Egypt, Morocco, Tunisia and Algeria.

"We are honored to have First Lady Margaret Kenyatta here today to launch this important initiative for improving breast cancer care in Kenya," said Roche's President for Africa, Dr. Jean-François Chappuis.
